Picking Friends From the Crowd: Amicus Participation as Political Symbolism

OMARI SCOTT SIMMONS

The modern process of amicus curiae participation is a form of political symbolism reflecting the Supreme Court's irreconcilable role in American democracy as a quasi-representative policy-making institution. Specifically, this political symbolism reassures the public, particularly vulnerable groups, of the Court's democratic character. Amicus participation dispels external public criticism that the Court is detached and indifferent to the public, without significantly undermining the Court's independence. Ultimately, the Court's institutional legitimacy rests upon the dual pillars of independence and inclusion. Amicus participation contributes significantly to the latter. Critics of the Court's current open door policy to amicus participation fear that the lack of additional constraints governing the submission of amicus briefs encourages partisan excess, promotes judicial activism, and unduly burdens the Court. However, the benefits to the Court and its multiple stakeholders outweigh these concerns. This Article builds upon the existing legal literature by (i) exploring amicus participation's value to multiple stakeholders, not simply the Court and (ii) highlighting the important link between amicus participation, political symbolism, and the Court's institutional legitimacy.

OMARI SCOTT SIMMONS*

I. INTRODUCTION

*In other words, all the Court has done today, to borrow from another context, is to look over the heads of the crowd and pick out its friends.*¹

The separation of governmental powers and a system of checks and balances to counter autocratic abuses within any branch of government are at the heart of democratic tradition in the United States. In theory, the Supreme Court is expected to provide stability in the administration of justice ensuring some degree of both horizontal and vertical equity for the polity.² For many groups and entities, the courts are the best, if not the only, government branch capable of guaranteeing substantive and procedural justice to all.³ For vulnerable groups, the court system, at least from a symbolic perspective, is the “great leveler.”⁴

Unlike other branches of government, ascendancy to the Supreme

² Horizontal equity is the equal treatment of equals. An example of this principle is seen in the equal protection context, which demands that similarly situated persons receive like treatment. See generally, U.S. CONST. amend. XIV. Vertical equity, on the other hand, is disparate treatment on account of legitimate differences. An example of vertical equity would be the heightened scrutiny afforded to racial and gender classifications in the equal protection context. See, e.g., Miss. Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724 (1982) (“Our decisions . . . establish that the party seeking to uphold a statute that classifies individuals on the basis of their gender must carry the burden of showing an ‘exceedingly persuasive justification’ for the classification.”).

³ See IRIS MARION YOUNG, INCLUSION AND DEMOCRACY 8 (Oxford Univ. Press 2000) (asserting that systems of representation are most inclusive when they encourage the “perspectives of relatively marginalized or disadvantaged social groups to receive specific expression”). Throughout this nation’s history, the Supreme Court has played a critical role in securing justice for groups that held little legislative weight or where political realities constrained the other branches of government from acting. A vivid example is the Warren Court’s decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

Court is not conditioned upon electoral politics or constituency demands. The lifetime appointment of Justices, in theory, frees them from being accountable to any particular ruling regime or constituency.⁵ Thus, pluralistic and partisan politics should play a limited role in judicial decision making. But, just how different is the Court from the legislative and the executive branches where organized interest groups mobilize to sway government outcomes?⁶ Undoubtedly, certain institutional similarities exist.

The Supreme Court's role in American democracy manifests a tension between the Court's duty to adjudicate disputes between two parties, resolving the specific conflict before it, and its role to create law, settling disputes between circuits and answering novel legal questions. By definition, every question the Supreme Court answers is either of constitutional significance, unanswered, or a source of confusion or disagreement between courts.⁷ A decision that says "party X prevails over party Y" simultaneously establishes victories and losses for others and implicitly affirms, provides further guidance, or overrules court decisions

⁵ See THE FEDERALIST No. 78 (Alexander Hamilton) (discussing the importance of permanent and independent judges in achieving and preserving justice).

⁶ The debate surrounding the question of whether and/or how much politics affects judicial decision making is not new. Proponents of legal formalism argue that the Supreme Court is not inherently political or subject to interest group pressures that plague the other branches of government. Instead, they envision an objective judiciary that is constrained by legal doctrine. Legal realists, on the other hand, assert that ideology and contextual factors are a driving force behind judicial decision making, not simply doctrine. See Stewart Macaulay, The New Versus the Old Legal Realism: 'Things Ain't What They Used to Be', 2005 WIS. L. REV. 365, 370 (2005) (providing a history of legal realism). Also, legal realists are most likely to contend that decision making is more about judicial activism as opposed to judicial restraint. Notwithstanding, judges, irrespective of political party affiliation, ardently refute the assertion that political ideology trumps adherence to doctrine. See Emerson H. Tiller & Frank B. Cross, A Modest Proposal for Improving American Justice, 99 COLUM. L. REV. 215, 229-30 (1999) (providing an empirical study of the effect of political ideology on judicial decision making). Tiller and Cross acknowledge a partisan component of judging at the federal circuit court level but also recognize that doctrine matters as well. Tiller and Cross are more concerned with eliminating the partisan component of judicial decision making. Accordingly, they identify particular instances where doctrine is most likely to matter and then propose that circuit panels be divided along party lines rather than being randomly selected. Tiller and Cross reason that the presence of a minority "whistleblower" has a disciplining effect on ideological decision making. Tiller and Cross's assertions have been challenged and, in some instances, mischaracterized by esteemed members of the U.S. Court of Appeals. See Patricia M. Wald, A Response to Tiller and Cross, 99 COLUM. L. REV. 235, 235 (1999) ("Although judges, as human beings, cannot help but be influenced by their life experiences, it is not fair to say that political philosophy is the invisible hand guiding all or even most appellate decisionmaking."). For example, Harry T. Edwards former Chief Judge for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, inaccurately dubbed Tiller and Cross's arguments as such: "Where the authors might have one believe that judging is entirely political, I maintain, and always have maintained, that appellate judging is fundamentally a principled practice." Harry T. Edwards, Collegiality and Decision Making on the D.C. Circuit, 84 VA. L. REV. 1335, 1337-38 (1998). Tiller and Cross, however, are not suggesting that judicial decision making is "entirely" political or unprincipled. This reluctance to acknowledge the potential of partisan influence on the part of the judiciary is perhaps because any admission that judicial decision making is partisan implies that the decision making process is impugned by bias.

on other cases. The Supreme Court cannot escape the reach of its decisions. It functions as a proxy for the entire judicial system. Although Supreme Court Justices are not elected like members of Congress, they nonetheless engage in law making. This institutional fact has led commentators to assert that the Supreme Court's legitimacy is inseparable from other governmental institutions in our society.⁸ Therefore, it is not surprising that the Court seeks and accepts input from many sources—particularly in the form of amicus briefs.⁹

Justices cannot simply rely on the immediate case and the skill (or lack thereof) of the immediate parties. Decisions are published pronouncements that must reflect good law and policy.¹⁰ The Court operates within a broader context of a “constitutional culture” that involves an ongoing conversation with non-judicial actors.¹¹ The modern process of

⁹ See BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 93 (8th ed. 2004) (“Amicus Curiae. . . . [Latin ‘friend of the court’] A person who is not a party to a lawsuit but who petitions the court or is requested by the court to file a brief in the action because that person has a strong interest in the subject matter.”).

¹⁰ Alexis de Tocqueville recognized this unique dilemma:

The peace, the prosperity, and the very existence of the Union are vested in the hands of seven judges. Without their active co-operation the Constitution would be a dead letter: the Executive appeals to them for assistance against the encroachments of the legislative powers; the Legislature demands their protections from the designs of the Executive; they defend the Union from the disobedience of the States; the States from the exaggerated claims of the Union, the public interest against the interests of private citizens, and the conservative spirit of order against the fleeting innovations of democracy. Their power is enormous, but it is clothed in the authority of public opinion. They are the all-powerful guardians of a people which respects law, but they would be impotent against popular neglect or popular contempt. The force of public opinion is the most intractable of agents, because its exact limits cannot be defined; and it is not less dangerous to exceed than to remain below the boundary prescribed.

ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE, DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA 150 (Henry Reeve trans., Colonial Press 1900) (emphasis added); see also Linda Greenhouse, What Got into the Court? What Happens Next?, 57 ME. L. REV. 1, 7 (2005) (“But no great Supreme Court case is only a question of law.”). De Tocqueville also believed that:

Federal judges must not only be good citizens, and men possessed of that information and integrity which are indispensable to magistrates, but they must be statesmen—politicians, not unread in the signs of the times, not afraid to brave the obstacles which can be subdued nor slow to turn aside such encroaching elements as may threaten the supremacy of the Union and the obedience which is due to the laws.

¹¹ See Robert C. Post, Foreword, Fashioning the Legal Constitution: Culture, Courts, and Law, 117 HARV. L. REV. 4, 11 (2003) (noting that “constitutional law emerges from an ongoing dialectic between constitutional culture and the institutional practices of constitutional adjudication”). Public perception and the legitimacy of the court are valid concerns as the following comments illustrate:

Indeed, the courts cannot do their job of fair and just adjudication of disputes without the trust and faith of the community, the bar, and even their own employees. The courts depend on the cooperation and participation of people from all three communities. If significant parts of those communities mistrust the impartiality of the courts, they will not provide the cooperation, participation, and support the system needs to function properly.

It is not enough for the courts to be just; they must also be perceived to be just.

amicus curiae participation is a form of political symbolism reflecting the Court's irreconcilable role in American democracy as a quasi-representative policy making institution. Specifically, the political symbolism of amicus curiae participation reassures the public, particularly vulnerable groups, of the Court's democratic character. Amicus participation dispels external public criticism that the Court is detached and indifferent to the public, without significantly undermining the Court's independence. Ultimately, the Court's institutional legitimacy rests upon the dual pillars of independence and inclusion. Amicus participation contributes significantly to the latter.

Critics of the Court's current open door policy to amicus participation fear that the lack of additional constraints governing the submission of amicus briefs encourages partisan excess, promotes judicial activism, and unduly burdens the Supreme Court.¹² However, the benefits to the Court and its multiple stakeholders outweigh these concerns. Amicus participation has received significant scholarly treatment in the legal and political science literature. Most of this literature either attempts to

Otherwise, the courts lose legitimacy as dispute resolvers and instead may be perceived as irrelevant or, worse, as instruments of oppression. The courts must, therefore, do more than simply avoid legally actionable bias. They must make certain that members of the three communities believe both that the courts are fair and that they will be treated equally when they enter the courthouse.

¹² This risk is underscored by evidence and arguments presented in amicus briefs that have not been challenged through the litigation process and are not subject to the same evidentiary safeguards as the parties' briefs. In Akins v. Federal Election Commission, the D.C. Circuit expressed its disapproval of a Supreme Court action that relied on an argument presented by an amici and not the immediate parties:

I recognize that the Supreme Court has moved pretty far from traditional notions of judicial restraint that confine courts to issues presented by the parties . . . but I think this decision represents another large step in that regrettable process insofar as it was an amicus—an amicus who had not appeared until the case reached the Supreme Court—who made the dispositive argument, one which was never once made before us.

Akins v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 146 F.3d 1049, 1050 (D.C. Cir. 1998); see also Jaffee v. Redmond, 518 U.S. 1, 35–36 (1996) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (noting that no organizations seek the truth besides the Court); Philip B. Kurland & Dennis J. Hutchinson, The Business of the Supreme Court O.T. 1982, 50 U. CHI. L. REV. 628, 647 (1983) (asserting amicus briefs are “a waste of time, effort, and money in a useless function”). Judge Richard Posner cites three limited instances in which amicus submissions should be permissible: (i) where “a party is not represented competently or is not represented at all”; (ii) where “the amicus has an interest in some other case that may be affected by the decision in the present case”; and (iii) where “the amicus has unique information or perspective that can help the court beyond the help that the lawyers of the parties can provide.” Ryan v. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n, 125 F.3d 1062, 1063 (7th Cir. 1997).

Most critics of amicus participation equate the value of amicus participation solely with the informational value it offers to Justices rendering decisions. These commentators, however, should consider adopting a more expansive approach to valuing amicus participation that takes into account multiple constituencies and embraces a broader understanding of the impact of symbolic reassurance on the Court's legitimacy. See Ruben J. Garcia, A Democratic Theory of Amicus Advocacy, 35 FLA. ST. U. L. REV. 315, 357 (2008) (“Increased amicus participation will have a democratizing influence on the litigation process” Moreover, “it is often more cost effective for social movements to make their voices heard as amicus parties than as parties bringing litigation.”).

anecdotally illustrate the impact of amicus briefs or empirically validate the impact of amicus briefs on judicial decision making.¹³ This Article builds upon this valuable literature by (i) exploring amicus participation's value to multiple stakeholders, not simply the Court and (ii) highlighting the important link between amicus participation, political symbolism, and the Court's legitimacy.

Part II of this Article provides historical background on amicus curiae participation before the Supreme Court and identifies factors that have contributed to its extensive use and transformation into a symbolic mechanism reflecting democratic inclusion.

Part III asserts modern amicus participation is a form of political symbolism that reassures the public—particularly vulnerable groups—of the Supreme Court's democratic character. This is especially true in cases having broad social impact and political salience, such as cases involving capital punishment, affirmative action, free speech, and assisted suicide. In this context, amicus participation provides a link between the Supreme Court and the polity, reinforcing the Court's institutional legitimacy. Amicus participation illustrates that inclusion, like independence, is a key pillar upon which the Court's institutional legitimacy rests.

Part IV provides an expansive view of the value of modern amicus participation to various stakeholders—the immediate parties, the Court, and the amici. The current legal literature does not incorporate the value amicus participation provides to the Court's various constituencies, namely the parties and the amici. Limiting the value analysis to the Court exclusively, while excluding other constituencies, understates the value of modern amicus participation.

Part V examines, at an aggregate level, the different entities that participate as amici before the Supreme Court. These diverse group dynamics reflect the Court's important societal function as a quasi-representative body and how the Court's inclusionary function reinforces ¹³ See, e.g., Gregory A. Caldeira & John R. Wright, Amici Curiae Before the Supreme Court: Who Participates, When, and How Much?, 52 J. POL. 782, 784 (Aug. 1990); Joseph D. Kearney & Thomas W. Merrill, The Influence of Amicus Curiae Briefs on the Supreme Court, 148 U. PA. L. REV. 743 (2000); Samuel Krislov, The Amicus Curiae Brief: From Friendship to Advocacy, 72 YALE L.J. 694 (1963); Kelly Lynch, Best Friends? Supreme Court Law Clerks on Effective Amicus Briefs, 20 J.L. & POL. 33, 49 (2004) (analyzing the effectiveness of amicus briefs from the perspective of Supreme Court clerks); Ryan J. Owens & Lee Epstein, Amici Curiae During the Rehnquist Years, 89 JUDICATURE 127, 129–32 (Nov.–Dec. 2005). For example, Kearney and Merrill interpret their empirical evidence concerning amicus briefs as an indication of the validity of certain judicial decision making models, i.e., the legal model, attitudinal model, and interest group theory of the judicial process. See id. Ultimately, they suggest that there is more empirical support for the legal model, than for the other decision making models. See id. Kearney and Merrill admittedly rely on three overly-simplistic models for judicial decision making, which as defined, do not contemplate that judicial decision making may employ a hybridized approach requiring a mixture of the models; or that certain types of cases (e.g., capital punishment, reproductive rights, voting rights, and affirmative action) and other contextual factors will determine the level of influence a particular decision making model may indeed have on swaying outcomes. Minus actual citation of amicus briefs such validation is difficult due to the number of intervening variables.

Part VI analyzes the Supreme Court's decisions in Washington v. Glucksberg and Roper v. Simmons, which exemplify the types of politically salient cases where the Court symbolizes a quasi-representative body.¹⁴ These examples provide a vivid illustration of the dynamics of amicus participation, the diverse interests involved, the types of argumentation employed, and the discursive exchange of perspectives. In this section, a deeper content-based analysis of the amicus briefs further reveals how the Court engages non-judicial actors in an ongoing dialogue.

Ultimately, this Article contends that modern amicus participation is a valuable symbolic mechanism reflecting democratic inclusion that, inter alia, provides a dotted line between the Court and the polity. This link reinforces the Court's institutional legitimacy. Consequently, efforts to restrict amici before the Court rather than encourage greater participation via the present "open door" policy should be approached with caution.

II. HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF AMICUS PARTICIPATION

A. Historical Beginnings

The submission of amicus briefs dates back as far as ancient Rome.¹⁵ Under the English common law system, amici provided the courts with impartial legal information beyond the court's expertise or immediate knowledge.¹⁶ Whereas the name amicus curiae or "friend of the court" described the function of amici at common law, today, some argue that the more apt description of amicus participation before the Supreme Court is "friend of a party."¹⁷ Today, the amicus brief "as a form of information gathering may provide the judicial counterpart of lobbying and congressional hearings in the legislative process."¹⁸ Amicus participation is just one of several mechanisms used by interest groups to influence government decision making.¹⁹

REV. 1109, 1123 (1988) [hereinafter Caldeira & Wright, Organized Interests]. Whereas interest group lobbying appears most prominently at the legislative level, interest groups actively lobby to alter the composition of the Supreme Court via the judicial appointments process and participate as amici.

Historically, the increased use of amicus briefs mirrored a “change in tactics and structure of interest articulation in American politics as a whole that occurred during the latter quarter of the nineteenth century.”²⁰ This period saw interest group activity transform “from personal, face-to-face contacts (including corruption) to impersonal, organized, and systematic, bureaucratically undertaken and oriented activity.”²¹ The advantages accruing to “bureaucratically sophisticated groups in other political arenas” became evident in the judicial context as well.²² These interest groups were characterized by their ability to mobilize resources, their use of expertise, their flexibility to respond quickly before policy was set, and their sensitivity to raising new issues.²³ Other influences on the use of amicus briefs included the growth of administrative agencies, the growth of the welfare state, and the government’s increased intervention in broad social problems such as school desegregation, racial covenants, and redistricting legislation.²⁴ During the initial decades of the twentieth century, amici filed briefs in only 10% of cases before the Supreme Court.²⁵ From 1986 through 1995, amici filed briefs in 85% of the Court’s argued cases.²⁶ Between 1945 and 1995, the number of amicus brief filings increased by more than 800%, while the numbers of cases decided on the merits did not increase.²⁷ Between 1996 and 2003, at least one amicus brief was filed in 95% of cases.²⁸

Some of the first private interest groups to effectively use the opportunity for broader access that amicus briefs provided included labor unions, “racial minority groups, securities and insurance interests, railroad interests, and miscellaneous groups under severe attack, notably the liquor interests in the first quarter of th[e] twentieth century.”²⁹ These groups perhaps selected this new channel of “self-protection or aggrandizement” due to “[s]heer familiarity with the intricacies of the existing system, strong dissatisfaction with it, and relative desperation.”³⁰ Yet, widespread use by civil rights organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union (“ACLU”) and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (“NAACP”) drew public attention to the issue of amicus participation.³¹ The NAACP (particularly the Legal Defense Fund ("LDF")), almost since its inception, has participated as amicus curiae in Supreme Court litigation.³² The NAACP "[i]n the face of failures to gain concessions from Congress, due in large part to the power wielded by the Southern Delegation, particularly in the Senate," turned to the judiciary where they experienced significant success.³³ NAACP victories altered the doctrinal development of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and elevated the legal status of African Americans.³⁴ Whether expanding the rights of blacks to vote,³⁵ preventing the systemic exclusion of blacks from juries,³⁶ or desegregating public schools,³⁷ litigation became the primary mechanism for championing minority rights that were difficult to obtain in other political venues. Not surprisingly, increased amicus participation ensued.

The coordination among primary litigants and amici was an essential aspect of the NAACP's litigation strategy.³⁸ The Restrictive Covenant Cases of 1948 are a classic example of amicus participation reflecting the norm of democratic inclusion.³⁹ In those cases, amicus briefs on behalf of American Indian groups, Japanese American groups, Jewish American groups, religious organizations, labor organizations, and others supported the black litigants, who were represented by the NAACP LDF lawyers.⁴⁰

The extensive use of amicus briefs and extralegal facts in Supreme Court jurisprudence can be attributed, in part, to a shift from exclusive reliance on the dominant paradigm of legal formalism during the nineteenth century to a greater influence of legal realism during the first half of the twentieth century.⁴¹ Legal realists rejected formalism and tried to convey how law operated in social, political, and economic contexts.⁴² As the Court became more accepting of extra-legal facts and social science evidence, progressive groups began to use amicus briefs to lobby the Court in politically charged cases such as those involving social legislation and desegregation.⁴³ The Warren Court in Brown was one of the first courts to use social science data extensively. In the wake of Brown, the submission of extra-legal evidence via amicus participation increased.⁴⁴

B. Modern Amicus Participation

Former Justice Felix Frankfurter argued for the restrictive use of amicus participation within the confines of the adversary system.⁴⁵ Frankfurter did not want to see the Court exploited or used as soapbox for interest group activity.⁴⁶ This narrow view of amicus participation and the adversarial system would support limiting the number of amici. Alternatively, Justice Hugo Black supported broadening amicus participation to a wide array of groups.⁴⁷ Black's broader vision of the adversarial system allowed for extensive participation by amici—acknowledging that cases before the Court affected many people beyond the immediate parties.⁴⁸ Under Black's approach, the Court acts in a quasi-representative capacity. Today, Supreme Court rules (or more accurately the lax enforcement of those rules) reflect Black's vision of amicus participation.

Presently, the Supreme Court allows for virtually unlimited amicus participation.⁴⁹ Amicus participation may take place at two stages in the

An amicus curiae brief that does not serve this purpose burdens Court, and its filing is not favored.”⁵⁵ Supreme Court rules expressly recognize both the utility and the excess of amicus briefs.⁵⁶ Some commentators argue that too much amicus participation and over-reliance on such briefs may unfairly disadvantage the immediate parties to the litigation.⁵⁷ Despite these concerns, “[t]he Supreme Court’s continued willingness to receive this rising tide of briefs from not-so-disinterested

SUP. CT. R. 37.4. Moreover, Supreme Court Rule 37.6 requires amici other than governmental entities to:

[I]ndicate whether counsel for a party authored the brief in whole or in part . . . and shall identify every person or entity, other than the amicus curiae, its members, or its counsel, who made such a monetary contribution. The disclosure shall be made in the first footnote on the first page of text.

third parties is, in our view, tacit recognition that most matters before the justices have vast social, political, and economic ramifications—far beyond the interest of the immediate parties.”⁵⁸ Just as interest groups have mobilized in Congress, they are lobbying before the Supreme Court as amici.⁵⁹

Although amici are represented in all types of Supreme Court litigation, they are most visible in cases that involve contentious and politically salient issues like abortion, eminent domain, free speech, capital punishment, and affirmative action.⁶⁰ These cases generate unusually large numbers of amicus briefs and political fervor.⁶¹ This is one of the most important findings from an empirical survey conducted by Joseph Kearney and Thomas Merrill.⁶² This finding indicates that in politically salient cases, the Court operates most like a quasi-representative body and reflects the norm of democratic inclusion.⁶³ Washington v. Glucksberg and Roper v. Simmons, which are explored in greater detail in Part VI, fall into this category of cases.⁶⁴

III. AMICUS PARTICIPATION AS SYMBOLIC REASSURANCE OF DEMOCRATIC INCLUSION

A. Symbolic Reassurance

Democratic procedures serve as a proxy for legitimacy. Specifically, amicus curiae participation provides symbolic reassurance of the Court’s receptiveness to the norm of democratic inclusion. In this sense, “men may dislike a winning candidate, law, or judge’s decision, yet be reassured by the forms of the election, legislature, or the court.”⁶⁵ In the judicial context, democratic inclusion provides that persons impacted by decisions should participate in the lawmaking process. The routinization

⁵⁸ Caldeira & Wright, supra note 13, at 783.

⁵⁹ Although the actual degree of influence amicus briefs have is difficult to quantify, the lofty expense and resources required in filing such briefs, at a minimum, suggests that groups filing amicus briefs believe they have some instrumental impact. Some commentators suggest that the cost of filing an amicus brief can range from $15,000 to $60,000. See Caldeira & Wright, Organized Interests, supra note 19, at 1112; see also Kearney & Merrill, supra note 13, at 801–19 (examining the impact of amici briefs through the legal model, which predicts that the Court is influenced by briefs that present especially valued information but not by briefs that are merely repetitive of the parties’ briefs).

⁶² See generally Kearney & Merrill, supra note 13.

⁶⁴ For a discussion of the significance of these cases within the scope of this Article, see infra Part VI.

characteristic of modern amicus participation creates the impression, whether actual or perceived, that groups have the opportunity to weigh in on judicial decisions that have broad social and political ramifications. Arguably, the Supreme Court and its decisions—with majority, concurring, and dissenting opinions along with supporting rationale, deserve greater respect than pronouncements from other government branches whose procedures may appear more ad hoc, arbitrary, less transparent, and less independent. The process of amicus curiae participation provides an additional layer of legitimacy and illustrates that the Court's "judicial authority might best be reconceived as a relationship of trust that courts forge with the American people."⁶⁶ In this sense, the Court's multiple constituencies coalesce around procedures that, irrespective of their tangible impact, symbolize elements of fairness. From this perspective, the Court's legitimacy is viewed primarily through a procedural lens rather than a substantive one. Yet, despite much disagreement concerning the shape of substantive judicial outcomes, democratic procedures add to the legitimacy—or promote the acquiescence—of the Court's rulings.

Democratic features in the judicial context are especially compelling because they provide symbolic reassurance for threatened or vulnerable groups who lack political capital in other venues such as Congress where political spoils go to the well-funded and well-organized. Democratic theorists espouse the value of citizen participation in the "design and implementation of policies that affect them."⁶⁷ This value includes not only the prospect of better substantive legal outcomes via discursive debate, but also the enhanced legitimacy of such reforms. Amicus participation provides a "deliberative forum" for groups excluded from the legislative process.⁶⁸ The absence or retraction of this participatory mechanism might result in discontent and exclusion.

The fair adjudication of cases alone will not always enhance the Court's legitimacy. The Supreme Court's legitimacy hinges upon the perception among multiple constituencies. Without a favorable perception among the polity, the Supreme Court loses its credibility as an arbiter of disputes or, even worse, becomes viewed as an agent of oppression.⁶⁹ And "[s]ince most societies claim to offer their citizens equal justice under the law, the courts are presumed repositories of equality and the solemn fora for the just adjudication of the law without regard to race, creed, color, appearance, or any other categorical distinction."⁷⁰ Therefore, the symbolism of broad amicus participation reinforces the Supreme Court's

Despite the benefits of symbolism, fair questions remain as to whether (i) there is a gap between democratic symbolism and democratic reality, and (ii) if so, does this present a problem? The answer to the first question is clearly yes, but the degree of discrepancy may also be relevant. The answer to the second question is less certain. One can make a credible argument that affected vulnerable groups are not adequately represented by amici especially in less politically salient cases. However, a strong argument can be made that amici adequately reflect vulnerable group interests especially when one acknowledges the historical use of amicus participation by civil rights organizations. Without question, amicus participation provides real democratic benefits to vulnerable groups. Nonetheless, there is a greater discrepancy between the Court's democratic symbolism and democratic reality when compared to other branches of government (e.g., Congress) characterized by electoral politics. Yet, the greater discrepancy in the judicial context should be viewed in a positive light because the Court's institutional legitimacy is also a function of its independence that would be undermined if the same degree of interest group influence prevailed. Moreover, the dichotomy between real democratic benefits versus symbolic ones may be overstated because legitimacy is determined from the observer's socially constructed vantage point.⁷¹ In other words, perception, to a large degree, is reality. Fair and independent adjudication is a necessity, but not a sufficient condition for the Court's legitimacy. The Court is unavoidably an independent body and a political actor. And the Court's institutional legitimacy rests on the dual pillars of inclusion and independence.

B. Defining Legitimacy

Few legal scholars dispute the importance of legitimacy and even fewer can define it in a concise manner.⁷² Legitimacy is a complex

⁷¹ EDELMAN, supra note 65, at 200.

⁷² Although few legal scholars dispute the importance of "legitimacy," most scholars have difficulty adequately defining legitimacy in a concise manner. Social scientists have tried to equate legitimacy with public opinion surveys; however, other scholars contend that such surveys oversimplify the complex nature of legitimacy. Moreover, some commentators assert that the general public is not well informed of the Court's practices and as a result opinion surveys may be misleading. See Richard Fallon, Jr., Legitimacy and the Constitution, 118 HARV. L. REV. 1787, 1825–26 (2005) (discussing the public's lack of "sufficient information" about the judiciary). In other words, being a legitimate institution does not mean people feel that the Justices are currently doing a good job. Richard Fallon asserts that legitimacy has three separate dimensions: legal, sociological, and moral. See generally id.; see also David A. Strauss, Legitimacy and Obedience, 118 HARV. L. REV. 1854, 1866 (2005) ("To question the legitimacy of something—a constitution, a statute, a legal regime—is to question whether it is entitled to obedience."). Under Fallon's framework, legal legitimacy is gauged by consistency with legal norms. A sociologically legitimate decision would be a decision that is accepted as deserving respect, obedience, or acquiescence. Moral legitimacy is a function of consistency with moral norms. See Fallon, supra, at 1794–96. Even within these three categories, Fallon identifies subcategories that reflect the complex nature of legitimacy. For example, sociological legitimacy has concept, and its measurement is at best a speculative exercise. Despite measurement difficulties and competing views concerning legitimacy, this Article maintains that the Court's institutional legitimacy is enhanced by broad amicus participation—especially in politically-charged cases.⁷³ For purposes of this Article, to challenge the legitimacy of the Supreme Court “is to question whether it is entitled to obedience.”⁷⁴ In this sense, the Supreme Court is a legitimate institution because of diffuse support and the general public's belief that it is a trustworthy decision maker whose rulings deserve to be obeyed.⁷⁵ This perception, in part, stems from procedures preserving the Court's independence. Yet the effective functioning of political institutions also requires the goodwill of the public.

Unlike Congress and the President, the Supreme Court lacks a formal ongoing connection to the electorate.⁷⁶ This suggests that the Court “must depend to an extraordinary extent on the confidence, or at least the acquiescence, of the public.”⁷⁷ Despite the formal lack of electoral three subcategories: (i) institutional legitimacy, i.e., the diffuse public belief that the court is a trustworthy decision maker whose rulings deserve obedience; (ii) substantive legitimacy, i.e., public belief that a decision is substantively correct that may vary from group to group; and (iii) authoritative legitimacy, i.e., a public belief that decisions ought to be obeyed or deserve acquiescence. See id. at 1828. Despite considerable categorization, Fallon acknowledges the limits of sorting legitimacy into neat linguistic categories and how certain categories may be interrelated. His analysis recognizes that a decision may be legally correct, but morally illegitimate or vice versa. Nearly twenty years before Fallon's legitimacy analysis, Geoffrey Hazard identified four separate aspects of legitimacy: (i) legal precedent; (ii) right-outcome; (iii) legal realism; and (iv) legal process. See Hazard, supra note 8, at 161–62. Under Hazard's framework, legal precedent asserts that judicial decisions are legitimate insofar as they are consistent with precedent. A legal realism basis of legitimacy maintains that reference to the text of a decision should be augmented by the political, social, and economic consequences of a decision. See id. at 171. The right outcome basis of legitimacy rests in the Justices' awareness of their own political viability. The legal process basis for legitimacy can be contrasted with the legislative process because there is no “log rolling, pork barreling, and substantive compromise” with the Court's interpretative practices and procedures. Id. at 183.

⁷³ From another perspective, legitimacy may reflect the belief that particular decisions of the Court are substantively correct. Substantive legitimacy, however, may vary from group to group, case to case, and methodology to methodology. Some fear broad amicus participation and subsequent reliance upon it may increase the risk that a form of judicial activism will result displacing legal doctrine. A study reported a negative relationship between judicial activism—as measured by the number of statutes invalidated by the Supreme Court—and public confidence. See Gregory A. Caldeira, Neither the Purse Nor the Sword: Dynamics of Public Confidence in the Supreme Court, 80 AM. POL. SCI. REV. 1209, 1223 (1986) (stating that the “public responds in a negative fashion to judicial negations of congressional statutes”). The question of whether the invalidation of a statute reflects judicial activism is a separate issue not argued here.

Thus, one could argue that the Court's legitimacy should be gauged according to its adherence to legal doctrine and precedent. But, one could also claim a decision is legitimate because its decisions reflected legal realism and were augmented by the consideration of circumstantial factors like economics and politics. See Hazard, supra note 8, at 171–72. Accordingly, “[t]here is too much controversy among legal elites, and too little informed endorsement among the mass public, to warrant strong claims of legal legitimacy (as opposed to weak or disputable ones) for the interpretive methodologies that substantially define the judicial role.” Fallon, supra note 72, at 1827.

⁷⁴ Strauss, supra note 72, at 1866.

⁷⁵ See Fallon, supra note 72, at 1828.

⁷⁶ One must, however, acknowledge the link, albeit tenuous, between the public and the Supreme Court appointment and confirmation process.

pressures to provide democratic legitimacy, the Court has traditionally fared well “in the estimations of the public, especially in comparison with other political institutions.”⁷⁸ The positive perception is perhaps due to the Court’s independence. But, amicus participation also heightens the Court’s legitimacy through allowing participation of interested third parties and providing a dotted-line link to the electorate. Some political theorists contend that “[t]he normative legitimacy of a democratic decision depends on the degree to which those affected by it have been included in the decision-making processes and have had the opportunity to influence the outcomes.”⁷⁹ The large number of amicus briefs filed in politically-charged cases as well as the actual content of the arguments raised within the briefs illustrate how “interest group amici may genuinely believe that the court responds to the principles of democratic rule.”⁸⁰ In this sense, the Supreme Court engages in a continuous dialogue and exchange with various constituencies via amicus participation and its opinions. Enhanced Supreme Court legitimacy as a matter of democratic inclusion may provide the strongest support for Justice Black’s vision of broad amicus participation.⁸¹

The Court’s role in American democracy demands some knowledge of public forces and opinion—especially when Justices share policy-making authority with elected politicians.⁸² Justices may consider the prospect of being overridden or ineffective enforcement by the other branches of government.⁸³ Therefore, “[J]ustices who wish to exert authority over the direction of American life will anticipate actions of the other branches of government.”⁸⁴ In addition, some scholars argue that the Court will avoid public defeat that would undermine its institutional authority—and as a result compromise to maintain the institution’s public authority.⁸⁵ This does not suggest, however, that the Court pays attention or responds to public demands like elected officials. Instead, the Court assumes a less dynamic, more symbolic quasi-representative function.

Although useful, public opinion is an inadequate proxy for legitimacy because it may oversimplify the complex and nuanced concept of legitimacy. For example, the public may disagree with a particular decision, but nonetheless acquiesce and obey the decision out of respect for the institution. Moreover, the mass public is not that familiar with the Court and its interpretive practices.⁸⁶ Whereas public opinion may vary widely, the Court's institutional legitimacy is more static.⁸⁷

The Supreme Court is a proxy for the entire U.S. judicial system and therefore an integral part of American democracy. As a matter of constitutional principle the Court "[m]ust be beyond politics," but it is unavoidably a political institution.⁸⁸ The Court's legitimacy rests with multiple constituencies and stakeholders. Consequently, the symbolic role of amicus participation is crucial because "more amicus participation may also increase the faith in the judicial system [and government] that is eroding in some quarters today."⁸⁹ Despite its imperfections, amicus participation is beneficial to advocating the public interest⁹⁰ and promoting the norm of democratic inclusion, which is a crucial element of the democratic ideal.⁹¹

IV. THE VALUE OF AMICUS BRIEFS⁹²

The existing literature on amicus participation embraces a restrictive view on the value of amicus participation by correlating the value of amicus participation to the impact it has on assisting judges rendering a decision.⁹³ Adopting a broader perspective, this Article contends that such a restrictive view may both understate and oversimplify the value of amicus participation to the Supreme Court's multiple constituencies (e.g., the parties, the amici, and the Justices). Accordingly, any discussion of reforming amicus participation before the Supreme Court (i.e., limiting access) should contemplate a more expansive view of value that considers amicus participation's symbolic reassurance of constituents and its preservation of institutional legitimacy.

⁸⁶ See id. at 1825–26.

⁸⁷ See Fallon, supra note 72, at 1827–29.

⁸⁸ Hazard, supra note 8, at 157. According to Hazard, the Court's role reflects an irreconcilable contradiction between constitutional principle and institutional fact. The constitutional principle is that the Court should be independent from primary political authority or should be beyond politics. The institutional fact is that the Court makes laws as well as applies them. The amicus brief is a crude device that has morphed into a multi-purpose instrument that helps reconcile the Court's role as an independent body and political actor. See id. at 153–57.

⁹² Part IV focuses on amicus participation at the merits stage because the decision of whether a court will grant a petition of certiorari is generally limited. This section also focuses on the broader value of amicus participation to the parties, amici, and the Court. Finally, this section makes the distinction between potential value as opposed to influence on the Court's decisional outcomes.

⁹³ But, without actual citations or discussion in Court opinions, determining the actual influence of amici on judges can be a speculative exercise. See discussion infra Part IV.C.

A. Value to the Parties

1. Endorsement

A common question surrounding amicus briefs is how much informational or strategic value they offer. Independent of legal argumentation, an amicus brief may serve as a group endorsement of a particular party or outcome in the hope that political pressure will bolster a party's case. Within the amicus brief and a motion for leave to file an amicus brief, groups (regardless of whether parties grant consent) indicate their "size, status, and expertise" through a required "statement of interest."⁹⁴ This "statement of interest" allows amici to communicate information about the political, social, economic consequences of the Court's decision as well as the legitimacy of their cause.⁹⁵ In such cases, groups may add their own prestige to the primary litigant's case or signal the presence of widespread and diverse support. For example, anecdotal evidence shows Supreme Court clerks give the ACLU's amicus briefs more consideration on account of their perceived superiority.⁹⁶ As one former Supreme Court clerk indicated, certain groups, such as the ACLU, are habitual filers and always make the "first cut" of amicus review.⁹⁷ This perception among clerks is, in part, due to organizational reputation and expertise.⁹⁸

Generally, the most cited amicus briefs come from frequent filers.⁹⁹ "Repeat players" are more likely to have an impact because they develop expertise and have access to specialists.¹⁰⁰ Amici are more likely to attract the Court's attention if the organization or its attorneys have a strong and extensive record of Supreme Court advocacy.¹⁰¹ Endorsement by reputable amici arguably bolsters a party's standing.

2. Supplementary Strategies

a. Bolstering a Party's Weak Legal Argumentation and Resources

Some amicus briefs serve an important function by providing legal guidance for the Court when the principal litigant lacks the legal talent of the amici.¹⁰² Amicus briefs, especially those from the government, can “buttress” a party’s weak presentation and even forward an argument not pursued by the parties.¹⁰³ These situations often occur when there is a stark contrast between the principal litigant and the amici in legal expertise and resources. In this sense, amici are crucial to articulating the public interest “both as a means of urging justice for underprivileged factions and in order to rebut opposing positions.”¹⁰⁴ For example, in Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, the City of San Diego sought to exclude billboards in certain areas of the City on grounds of traffic safety and aesthetics, but the billboards were a mix of commercial and political messages.¹⁰⁵ Since the billboard owners were not in a position to argue credibly on behalf of political speech because they themselves did not engage in political speech, their attorney requested that the ACLU file an amicus brief emphasizing the political speech aspects of the case.¹⁰⁶ In a close decision, the Court ultimately ruled the ordinance was unconstitutional because it regulated political speech.¹⁰⁷ Here, the billboard owners advanced their cause by enlisting the resources and support of the ACLU.¹⁰⁸

b. Presenting Subtle Variations or Emotive Arguments

Even when the representation for the principal litigants is relatively adequate, amicus curiae may still perform an important “subsidiary role.”¹⁰⁹ In this role, amici present “subtle variations of the basic argument, or emotive and even questionable arguments that might result in a successful verdict, but are too risky to be embraced by the principal litigant.”¹¹⁰ By injecting these arguments via amicus briefs, “[a] minimum

B. Value to Amici

1. Counteractive Lobbying

Interest groups may submit amicus briefs, despite the ideological or partisan composition of the Court, to counteract other amici. For example, in a situation where the composition of the Court would appear to almost guarantee a decision in a group’s favor, interest groups may still have an incentive to submit briefs to counteract the influence of opposition groups.¹¹³ Although most research explaining this phenomenon focuses on the legislative context, it is nonetheless instructive for the Supreme Court context in which amici must strategically consider the efforts of competing groups when attempting to influence three types of decision makers—those predisposed to favor the group’s position, those predisposed to disapprove, and those who are uncommitted.¹¹⁴ The popularity of the amicus brief as a lobbying tool may stem from the fact that amicus participation is a less expensive alternative than standard lobbying or a publicity campaign.¹¹⁵ Similarly, when compared to filing a separate lawsuit, amicus participation may be a more effective strategy because it lacks the procedural complexity of a separate lawsuit and is less expensive.¹¹⁶ Although lobbying the Court may still place certain groups with fewer organizational resources at a disadvantage, the Court nonetheless is more democratic given the presence of amici.¹¹⁷ Moreover, a credible argument can be ¹¹³ See generally David Austen-Smith & John R. Wright, Counteractive Lobbying, 38 AM. J. POL. SCI. 25 (1994).

¹¹⁴ Commentators also acknowledge that groups have other reasons for filing briefs such as showing the groups importance to its own members even if there is little evidence that a brief will influence judicial outcomes. See Collins, supra note 80, at 825–26. The relatively low costs of amicus participation make this possible. See discussion infra Part IV.B.3.

¹¹⁵ Schachter, supra note 16, at 116.

¹¹⁶ See id. at 117 (discussing the complexity of joinder and intervention in the context of class actions).

¹¹⁷ Commentators acknowledge how amici have a democratizing influence on the Court, but also cite certain drawbacks:

Increasing technological complexity and the need for information will likely make the U.S. Supreme Court a more democratic place, but the democracy that will flourish in the marble palace will be pluralistic, and organized interests with significant lobbying strengths in those other branches will exercise considerably more influence than those less well endowed. Thus, lobbying the Court will continue to become more akin to lobbying the legislatures, and groups with fewer organizational resources will not likely overcome their political disadvantages by entering the judicial arena.

SUZANNE U. SAMUELS, FIRST AMONG FRIENDS 221 (2004).

made that certain amici such as LDF and the ACLU do reflect the interests of vulnerable groups.

2. Highlighting Externalities or Silently Impacting Other Contexts

Different organizations do not enter the fray of amicus participation on the same terms. For example, for organizations such as the NAACP and the ACLU, it is their business to litigate on behalf of groups. In other scenarios, the amici's connection to the immediate parties can be indirect or tenuous at best. Yet, amicus participation may bring the consequences of a decision on discrete interests or third parties to the attention of the Court.¹¹⁸ In this sense, amicus participation provides a vehicle for discrete interests, who either lack standing or are unaccomplished litigators, to lobby the Court and perhaps raise its awareness of third parties and the effect of a decision beyond its immediate context.¹¹⁹ Groups may also desire third party consequences and outcomes, but choose not to alert the Court. By planting language and arguments in the instant case, groups can strategically advance their cause in other contexts. For instance, a pro-life group may participate as an amici in a physician-assisted suicide case (without mention of the abortion issue) understanding that a favorable disposition may undermine the pro-choice position in the abortion context.¹²⁰ Thus, the arguments made by amici may only be a pretext for a group's true motivations or intended results.

3. Signaling Amici's Involvement to its Own Members, Potential Members, and Other Organizations

Interest groups have other motivations than to simply influence the Supreme Court's output. The existing amicus participation literature fails to adequately explain or entertain the secondary motivations of multiple stakeholders. One study of amicus participation has determined that coalition amicus briefs may not play a statistically significant role in increasing success before the Supreme Court, and as a result, interest groups may have other motivations.¹²¹ Interest groups are always interested in satisfying their current membership, attracting additional membership, and building relationships with similarly aligned organizations. Thus, amici coalition briefs are a low-cost mechanism for showing a group's members and potential members that the organization is actively pursuing policy goals and wielding influence in the judicial arena.¹²² In addition, coalition amici activity is a low cost method for group interaction and collaboration.

¹¹⁸ In Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), a particular amicus brief filed by former prominent military personnel attracted significant attention from the Court. See Sylvia H. Walbolt & Joseph H. Lang Jr., Amicus Briefs Revisited, 33 STETSON L. REV. 171, 177 (2003). The brief did not simply replicate the legal arguments in each party's brief. Rather, this brief introduced an entirely unique factual perspective by articulating the "importance of race-conscious admissions and recruiting practices of service academies and the ROTC." Id. at 179. In addition, this amicus brief was particularly compelling because it was presented during a period of armed conflict when the Nation's attention was focused on the war in Iraq. See id. Here, the amici prompted the Court to consider the consequences of the decision "outside the narrow scope of one particular university's admissions procedures." Id. at 180. Similarly, in a right to die case, the AMA may not argue the law as much as the policy burden on doctors and medical ethics because they have no direct interest in the parties involved in the case. See discussion infra Part V.A.

¹¹⁹ The brief submitted by the women's groups in Washington v. Glucksberg is an example. See discussion infra Part V.A.

C. Value to the Court

1. Information Gathering

One can argue that amicus briefs alleviate costly information gathering which adds to the stability of the political system.¹²³ Governmental and non-governmental organizations have access to a plethora of information that is not readily available to the Court.¹²⁴ By providing supplemental information, amici can preserve judicial resources whereas repetitive information may do the opposite. Amicus participation provides valuable information in two principle ways: (i) acting as barometer for interest group activity and public opinion¹²⁵ and (ii) providing supplemental substantive legal, policy, and social science arguments.¹²⁶

a. The Barometer Function

Amicus participation serves as a crude barometer of public opinion, particularly in politically-charged cases. However, unlike public opinion surveys and other fora where interest groups participate, amicus briefs are more focused on case related issues and the audience is more clearly defined via the statement of interest.¹²⁷ Justices can acquire information about societal demand and significance by observing the extent of amicus

¹²¹ See Collins, supra note 80, at 825–26.

¹²³ See Caldeira & Wright, Organized Interests, supra note 19, at 1123.

participation.¹²⁸ However, the exact degree of responsiveness the Justices exhibit when selecting their dockets or rendering a decision remains uncertain.¹²⁹

b. Substantive Information

Beyond signaling interest group or public support, amici also provide valuable information in the form of substantive legal, policy and social science arguments. Amicus brief submission is the most widely used method for submitting social science data as non-record evidence.¹³⁰ However, some commentators argue that the politicization of amicus briefs is alarming because Justices do not have an adequate mechanism for independently assessing the claims, the research, and the evidence submitted.¹³¹ From this perspective, the Justices are vulnerable to being “misled” by politically distorted social science data.¹³² Notwithstanding these criticisms, amici continue to lend support to the Court in this manner.¹³³

Scholars further speculate that information presented to the Court via amici will become increasingly influential. For example, cases involving highly technical issues, such as new reproductive technologies that have only been heard in lower federal and state courts, will eventually reach the Court.¹³⁴ While seeking to understand these complex issues, the Justices will rely on information provided by medical, scientific, and legal experts about the nature of these technologies and the role of social norms and traditions in determining issues like parental status.¹³⁵ Anecdotal evidence indicates that amicus briefs addressing specialized areas of law (e.g., tax, bankruptcy) provide valuable guidance to the Court whereas briefs reiterating constitutional arguments made by the parties are of lesser value.¹³⁶

¹²⁸ See Lucius T. Barker, Third Parties in Litigation: A Systemic View of the Judicial Function, 29 J. POL. 41, 56 (1967) (“The amicus brief, in a sense, also allows the Court to weigh ‘political’ information in a judicial way.”).

¹²⁹ See Jonathan Alger & Marvin Krislov, You’ve Got to Have Friends: Lessons Learned From the Role of Amici in the University of Michigan Cases, 30 J.C. & U.L. 503, 528 (2004) (“Amicus briefs can also be helpful if central, unifying themes emerge from the cacophony of voices in front of the court. In this respect, amicus briefs that focus solely on external organizations’ own agendas are not as helpful as briefs that highlight the broader societal impact . . .”).

¹³¹ See Rustad & Koenig, supra note 42, at 93–94.

Munford, When Does the Curiae Need an Amicus?, 1 J. APP. PRAC. & PROCESS 279, 281 n.12 (1999).

Unlike other forms of evidence that have been presented and challenged throughout the litigation process, evidence contained in amicus briefs is not subject to cross-examination or expert testimony from either side.¹³⁷ Amicus briefs lack the safeguards characteristic of other forms of evidence. Parties, however, do receive the briefs and have the opportunity to respond or rebut information, facts, and arguments contained in the briefs. Nonetheless, such a task may be unduly burdensome and drain resources. Furthermore, amici, unlike the parties, do not have to work from a trial record or preserve issues for appeal. These concerns, however, are mitigated via (i) disclosure requirements under Supreme Court Rules to identify potential bias; (ii) the conservation of judicial resources via information gathering; and (iii) the skill of the Justices and their clerks.¹³⁸ In the absence of rules restricting access, the Court has developed its own filtering mechanisms for analyzing amicus briefs¹³⁹ and, upon occasion, provided informal guidance to potential filers concerning the Court's (or Justices') preferences.¹⁴⁰ Ultimately, the usefulness of findings and arguments presented in amicus briefs hinges on their adequate evaluation.¹⁴¹

2. Legitimacy

Legitimacy is rarely mentioned in the legal literature addressing amicus participation, but its importance cannot be ignored. The normative basis for broad amicus participation as currently practiced is not simply informational value. The Court's institutional legitimacy depends on both norms of inclusion and independence. Amicus participation contributes to the former.¹⁴²

V. WHO PARTICIPATES AS AMICI

This section focuses on the dynamics of amicus participation—who, when, and why amici participate. The Supreme Court is accessible to a wide array of interests via amicus participation. This broad participation reinforces democratic norms of inclusion. Often entities become amici because they lack direct litigant status, they fail to meet the standard for intervention,¹⁴³ or simply because of the advantages that amicus status brings (i.e., flexibility and cost). Some organizations may not have the

A number of factors may determine the degree of review a brief receives include, but are not limited to: the reputation of the filer, the substantive nature of the case, and Court workload.

resources to achieve their goals through litigation or an organization may not find a suitable plaintiff to represent at the trial stage. For such groups, amicus participation can provide a rare opportunity to affect policy at the top. In 1982 alone, the Supreme Court had over 3000 amici representing over 1400 distinct organizations.¹⁴⁴ Generally, amici fall into two broad categories—non-governmental and governmental entities.¹⁴⁵

A. Non-Governmental Entities

The broad category of non-governmental entities includes a myriad of subcategories: individuals; charitable and community organizations; public interest law firms and policy research groups; citizen and public interest advocacy groups; business, trade, and professional organizations; and unions.¹⁴⁶ These organizations are very diverse in their membership, ideology, resources, focus, and flexibility. For example, the principal function of public interest advocacy organizations such as the LDF, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law (“LCCRUL”), and ACLU is litigation. Meanwhile, for community organizations such as the Boy Scouts, professional organizations such as the American Medical Association (“AMA”), and unions like the AFL-CIO, litigation does not constitute the bulk of their activities, but when it does, it usually takes the form of amicus participation.¹⁴⁷ Even within organizational categories there is significant differentiation. Whereas LDF confines itself to issues related to racial and ethnic discrimination, the ACLU litigates a broader range of issues. It is important to note that organizations may have a direct or indirect interest in a case’s outcome. An organization may support a party only because an unfavorable decision in the instant case may have consequences in other contexts. For instance, a pro-life interest group may weigh in on an issue such as physician-assisted suicide only because of the potential implications in the abortion context.¹⁴⁸

B. Governmental Entities

Governmental entities participate more than other groups of amici. These entities include state, county, district, municipal, and the federal government (e.g., the Solicitor General).¹⁴⁹ In fact, individual states alone participate more than other groups at both stages of amicus participation.¹⁵⁰

¹⁴⁴ Caldeira & Wright, supra note 13, at 789.

¹⁴⁵ Supreme Court Rule 37 makes a similar distinction by imposing greater filing requirements on non-governmental entities. SUP. CT. R. 37.

¹⁵⁰ Id. at 793–94. States account for approximately over one-third of amicus participation at the agenda setting stage and a quarter of amici at the plenary stage. Id.

According to one study, state amici filed briefs in 14.5% of cases from 1946 to 1995.¹⁵¹ As previously mentioned, Supreme Court Rules impose fewer filing restrictions on governmental entities favoring the participation of governmental amici. Widespread state participation is also related to the wide reach of Court decisions. Whenever the Supreme Court addresses the constitutionality of a statute with statewide application, the Supreme Court considers the view taken by a state or its agents as “highly relevant.”¹⁵² For example, when a state’s assisted suicide law is under constitutional scrutiny, not just that state will participate, but every other state with a similar law will also attempt to influence the Court’s decision.¹⁵³ The high degree of state participation is evidence of intergovernmental lobbying of the Supreme Court.¹⁵⁴

The most influential governmental entity, however, is the Office of the Solicitor General.¹⁵⁵ The Solicitor General, the Government’s chief litigator before the Supreme Court, is appointed by the President.¹⁵⁶ The United States (or the Solicitor General) is the most successful as well as the most frequent amici before the Court.¹⁵⁷ The Solicitor General has ¹⁵⁵ According to the Kearney study, the Solicitor General filed briefs in sixteen percent of cases (991 cases) from 1946–95. Kearney & Merrill, supra note 13, at 753 n.25. Moreover, the Solicitor General’s amicus briefs are cited most frequently by the Court. In fact, the Court cited the Solicitor General as amici in “[forty percent] of cases in which the Solicitor General filed a brief” between 1946 and 1995 (402 cases). Id. at 760.

¹⁵⁶ The functions of the Office of the Solicitor General are as follows:

The task of the Office of the Solicitor General is to supervise and conduct government litigation in the United States Supreme Court. Virtually all such litigation is channeled through the Office of the Solicitor General and is actively conducted by the Office. The United States is involved in approximately two-thirds of all the cases the U.S. Supreme Court decides on the merits each year.

The Solicitor General determines the cases in which Supreme Court review will be sought by the government and the positions the government will take before the Court. The Office’s staff attorneys, Deputy Solicitors General and Assistants to the Solicitor General, participate in preparing the petitions, briefs, and other papers filed by the government in the Supreme Court. The Solicitor General conducts the oral arguments before the Supreme Court. Those cases not argued by the Solicitor General personally are assigned either to an Assistant to the Solicitor General or to another government attorney. The vast majority of government cases are argued by the Solicitor General or one of the office attorneys.

Another responsibility of the Office is to review all cases decided adversely to the government in the lower courts to determine whether they should be appealed and, if so, what position should be taken. Moreover, the Solicitor General determines whether the government will participate as an amicus curiae, or intervene, in cases in any appellate court.

monopolistic authority to choose whether the government will litigate, how the government will litigate, and how legal resources will be allocated. The Solicitor General's decision to allocate resources toward arguing as amicus curiae in lieu of litigating cases where the agencies are directly involved potentially "exacerbates the risks of political partisanship"¹⁵⁸ The decision to file an amicus brief is largely a discretionary exercise. The Solicitor General can submit an amicus brief any time a federal interest can be shown in a case.¹⁵⁹ Supreme Court Rule 37.4 does not require the Solicitor General to acquire consent from either of the parties. Furthermore, the Supreme Court "often invites the Solicitor General to file an amicus brief in order to ascertain the opinion and otherwise unavailable information" from the federal government or the executive branch.¹⁶⁰ Approximately one-third of the United States' participation as amicus curiae is the result of Court invitation.¹⁶¹

Amicus participation may present an opportunity for the Solicitor General's Office to interject the partisan ideology of the executive branch at the expense of the individual agencies.¹⁶² The Solicitor General's ambiguous and unique role leads critics to question his ultimate allegiance because the office embodies an agency problem that only worsens when filing amicus briefs.¹⁶³ The most evident connection the Solicitor General has is to the President who appoints him. The President may exert both direct and indirect influences on the Solicitor General's activities. The need for monitoring by the President is mitigated by the fact that the President usually appoints individuals who share the President's views.¹⁶⁴

¹⁶⁴ See id. at 681. For example, when President Lyndon B. Johnson offered the Solicitor Generalship to Thurgood Marshall, "he complimented Marshall's ability as a lawyer and said he needed an outstanding legal mind to represent him before the Supreme Court." JUAN WILLIAMS, THURGOOD MARSHALL: AN AMERICAN REVOLUTIONARY 314-15 (1998) (emphasis added). Johnson also was very clear about making no explicit future promises about a Supreme Court appointment: "I want that distinctly understood—there's no quid pro quo here at all. You do your job. If you don't do it, you go out. If you do it, you stay here. And that's all there is to it." Id. Moreover, when Johnson heard of Marshall's plans to commute from New York, he articulated his disapproval. See id. at 318. Almost three weeks later Marshall sent the President a note expressing his plans to move his family to

Furthermore, “in many amicus appearances, the issues are rather apolitical and unlikely to be of special interest to the President.”¹⁶⁵

The federal government’s submission of amicus briefs has increased over time.¹⁶⁶ Between 1966 and 1977 amicus briefs constituted only twenty percent of the federal government’s participation before the Supreme Court.¹⁶⁷ Today, as much as forty-five percent of the Solicitor General’s argumentation is through amicus submission.¹⁶⁸ Surprisingly, the United States has a higher success rate when it participates as amici as opposed to participating as a party. According to some studies, the United States’ view prevails in approximately seventy-five percent of the cases in which it participates as amici.¹⁶⁹ An amicus brief from the Solicitor General’s office is a political barometer from which the Court can ascertain the likely executive reaction.¹⁷⁰ In Brown, the Solicitor General’s amicus brief provided the Court with the needed assurance that the chief executive supported an order ruling against segregation.¹⁷¹

The Solicitor General may have other important goals for filing amicus briefs besides espousing executive ideology that may include providing the Court with unavailable information,¹⁷² presenting her own views on important government issues,¹⁷³ protecting the government who may be a party in interest, articulating a singular government voice,¹⁷⁴ and providing a flexible strategy for dealing with agencies.¹⁷⁵ Other factors supporting the Solicitor General’s broad discretionary power include the fact that the Solicitor General’s staff are regarded as among the best attorneys in the country and that the Solicitor General plays a crucial role by decreasing the

¹⁷⁵ Id. at 562. For example, in *Bob Jones University v. Court's workload.¹⁷⁶ The latter "gatekeeper" function is perhaps the most important.¹⁷⁷ The Solicitor General's influence is indisputable in both agenda setting and asserting the Government's position at the merits phase of Supreme Court litigation.

C. When Groups Enter as Amici

At the Supreme Court, there is a fairly constant "mix of interest representation across institutional contexts."¹⁷⁸ Approximately thirty percent of all amicus activity occurs at the certiorari or agenda setting stage.¹⁷⁹ In general, governmental entities and business groups are more active than other organizations at the agenda setting stage. As a result, one would expect governmental entities and business groups to play a larger role in setting the Court's agenda.¹⁸⁰ Some argue that this discrepancy may be due in part to informational advantages.¹⁸¹ Public choice accounts of interest group participation also support this result.¹⁸² The majority of amicus participation, however, takes place at the merits phase where the discrepancies between governmental entities and non-governmental participation become less pronounced.¹⁸³ Most organizations participate at the merits phase rather than the agenda setting stage, due in part to cost effectiveness, but also due to the fact that cases become more visible once the Court grants certiorari.¹⁸⁴ Accordingly, citizen groups and public interest law firms allocate most of their resources toward the merits phase. Once cases appear on the Court's docket, organizations can prepare more effectively, and the stakes rise as well.¹⁸⁵ At the later merits stage, amicus participation becomes more pluralistic symbolizing democratic inclusion.¹⁸⁶

The different strategies governmental entities and non-governmental entities use to determine when and how to participate as amici may be a function of organizational concerns such as cost effectiveness,¹⁸⁷ constituencies, and information asymmetries.¹⁸⁸ Instead of pooling resources and filing coalition briefs, the general pattern is for groups, both governmental and non-governmental, to file multiple separate briefs, which are more costly.¹⁸⁹ But more coalition activity occurs with governmental entities, especially among states.¹⁹⁰ This may suggest some form of signaling that groups value. Coalition briefs give the appearance of widespread, diverse, and prestigious support. Although the degree of influence that groups exert over the Court is uncertain, the continued presence of heightened group activity, at a minimum, signals that amici value their own participation. In this sense, the Court's institutional legitimacy is reinforced through the symbolic reassurance and discursive process of amicus participation.

VI. THE EXAMPLES OF WASHINGTON V. GLUCKSBERG AND ROPER V. SIMMONS

Amicus participation plays a symbolic role and the Court operates most like a quasi-representative body in cases involving contentious social and political issues such as abortion, free speech, affirmative action, and physician-assisted suicide. The types of issues involved in a case may influence the Court's receptiveness to amici.¹⁹¹ For instance, topics such as physician-assisted suicide and capital punishment have broad social consequences that stretch across individual, organizational, jurisdictional, and moral boundaries.¹⁹² Under such circumstances, Justices cannot confine themselves to the immediate parties or dispute—otherwise they risk damaging the Court's institutional legitimacy. In other contexts, ¹⁸⁷ The cost of filing an amicus brief can range between $15,000 and $60,000. See Caldeira & Wright, supra note 13, at 800; see also Caldeira & Wright, Organized Interests, supra note 19, at 1112. Hence, the cost is not trivial.

¹⁸⁸ See Caldeira & Wright, supra note 13, at 794, 798.

¹⁸⁹ See id. at 804. There is anecdotal evidence suggesting that the Justices would prefer that parties file coalition briefs when possible to limit the burden on the court. See Mauro, supra note 56 (quoting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg concerning participation by amici).

¹⁹⁰ See Caldeira & Wright, supra note 13, at 798–99.

¹⁹¹ There is anecdotal evidence that the Court values external input in certain cases as opposed to others. See Lynch, supra note 13, at 41–42 (“The majority of clerks (56%) explained that amicus briefs were most helpful in cases involving highly technical and specialized areas of law, as well as complex statutory and regulatory cases.”). Amici may be more influential in cases addressing technical and scientific issues beyond the Court's expertise. See Stephanie Tai, Friendly Science: Medical, Scientific, and Technical Amici Before the Supreme Court, 78 WASH. U.L.Q. 789, 794–97 (2000) (“The unique perspectives, facts, and arguments of scientific disciplines can inform that Court of the broader legal and policy implications of its rulings.”); see also Mauro, supra note 56. However, this is difficult to empirically validate. Nonetheless, interest groups seize the opportunity to influence or sway outcomes.

where the issues lack political salience and amicus participation is minimal, the risk is attenuated.

The level of amicus participation, the diversity of amici, and the actual content of the arguments raised by the amici in Washington v. Glucksberg (an assisted suicide case) and Roper v. Simmons (a death penalty case) are instructive for the overall discussion of political symbolism and the Supreme Court's quasi-representative function. Ultimately, these examples illustrate that the Court "encourages the aggregation and articulation of interests" and shares some similarities with other representative institutions.¹⁹³ Yet, the Court's representative function is more symbolic. This, however, does not present a problem. In fact, this may be a source of comfort because the Court's institutional legitimacy is also tied to its stability and independence. The Court's representative capacity must be balanced with its independence. Ultimately, the Court's judgment rests with nine Justices who are not threatened with removal.

In addition to robust participation by diverse amici, the content of the arguments raised by amici illustrates how amicus participation provides a deliberative and discursive forum.¹⁹⁴ The perspectives of amici may enhance the prospect of better substantive decisions and the mere opportunity to participate in the lawmaking process enhances the Court's legitimacy even where a party disagrees with the ultimate outcome.¹⁹⁵ Discursive debate and participation is particularly important for groups normally excluded from the legislative process. In general, amici in Glucksberg and Roper made one or a combination of six types of argumentation: (i) legal arguments; (ii) ethical arguments raising moral and ethical concerns in support of a particular decision; (iii) emotive arguments using graphic imagery and language intended to evoke an emotional response; (iv) externality arguments intended to inform the Court about the consequences of a decision beyond the immediate context and its effect on third parties; (v) signaling arguments showing the Court the size, prestige, and expertise of the amici; and (vi) policy arguments employing empirical evidence, policy analysis, and social science evidence. The following subsections provide examples of the diverse amici and the content of the arguments they pursued in Glucksberg and Roper.

In Washington v. Glucksberg, the Supreme Court addressed the question of whether a state statute criminalizing assisted suicide violated the Due Process Clause insofar as it prohibited physicians from administering lethal doses of medication to competent terminally ill patients upon their request.¹⁹⁶ The Court held in favor of the State of Washington (the petitioner), concluding that (i) the asserted right to assistance in committing suicide was not a fundamental right protected by the Due Process Clause and (ii) Washington's ban on physician-assisted suicide was rationally related to legitimate government interests.¹⁹⁷ In total, there were over fifty amicus briefs submitted at the merits stage. These briefs represented a diverse range of parties from the Solicitor General to women's rights groups to an individual John Doe afflicted with a terminal illness. These briefs were submitted in support of petitioner (i.e., the State of Washington), in support of respondents (i.e., terminally ill patients, physicians, and nonprofits), and for the purpose of neutral advocacy. Although there was a considerable degree of repetitive argumentation among the different amici who supported the same party, the amici differed in their reasons for support and in the types of argumentation they pursued.

1. Amici Supporting Petitioners

a. Governmental Amici

In Washington v. Glucksberg, approximately two-thirds of the amicus briefs at the merits stage were in support of petitioners. This support came from a significant number of governmental entities. For example, the Solicitor General asserted that the physician-assisted suicide issue is of governmental interest because the "United States owns and operates numerous health care facilities which permit patients to refuse life-sustaining treatment, but do not permit physicians to assist patients in committing suicide by providing lethal dosages of medication."¹⁹⁸ The Solicitor General argued that although there was a liberty interest (though not fundamental) at stake, "[o]verriding state interests justify the State's decision to ban physicians from prescribing lethal medication."¹⁹⁹ Moreover, the Solicitor General noted that state legislatures "undoubtedly have the authority" to create exceptions to a ban on assisted suicide, "[b]ut

there is no constitutional basis for imposing that exception on all States.”²⁰⁰ The Solicitor General was not the only party from the federal government to submit an amicus brief in this case. Senator Orrin Hatch, Representative Henry Hyde, and Representative Charles Canady submitted a brief arguing for a restraint on judicial review and cautioned against the Court usurping the judgments of state legislatures and courts.²⁰¹

Not surprisingly, many states with similar statutes at risk of being invalidated submitted briefs. Instead of submitting separate briefs, many states submitted coalition briefs. In general, state amici asserted legal arguments that placed extreme emphasis on federalism concerns and “[r]espect for state sovereignty and the power of the people to directly govern their own affairs, unless excluded by the Constitution or valid act of Congress.”²⁰² The states also noted that a majority of states (forty-seven out of fifty) make the distinction between refusing unwanted life sustaining treatment and the act of suicide in their natural death/living will statutes.²⁰³ Here, the states’ coalition brief signaled to the Court the presence of a majority consensus.

The State of Oregon submitted a separate individual brief.²⁰⁴ Although Oregon had altered its laws to permit physician-assisted suicide for the terminally ill, it supported petitioners nonetheless. Oregon asserted that the minority of states that permit physician-assisted suicide (or those that are considering it) also have an interest in the outcome of the case because if terminally ill adults have a fundamental liberty interest in physician-assisted suicide, “state supervision and regulation in this area will be subject to exacting judicial review.”²⁰⁵ Although a decision for respondents would not invalidate Oregon’s assisted suicide law, it would undermine state legislative discretion overall. Oregon’s brief contended that the approaches of both Washington and Oregon were constitutionally permissible. Although the states' briefs articulated similar arguments, Oregon's brief, coming from a minority jurisdiction's perspective, performed a complementary function.

Whether that balance should be abandoned and the line redrawn to permit an individual to commit suicide without state interference, and then redrawn yet again to permit assisted suicide, is a matter appropriately left for the people to decide, through their duly elected representatives or by initiative ballot. The principles of federalism embodied in our Constitution require no less.

Another interesting government brief came from prosecuting attorneys in Oakland County, Michigan where the famous Jack Kevorkian had performed more than forty-five physician-assisted suicides.²⁰⁶ The prosecutors acknowledged that "[b]oth petitioners and amici can inform the Court of the certainty that recognition of a new constitutional right will inevitably start our society on a trip down [a] 'slippery slope'"²⁰⁷ The prosecutors wanted to avoid the submission of a "me-too" brief, and accordingly the prosecutors described themselves as the only amicus who could inform the Court about "actual practical experience with the reality of assisted suicide" having attempted to prosecute Jack Kevorkian, the "'poster child' of the assisted suicide movement."²⁰⁸ The prosecutors cautioned that physician-assisted suicide was incapable of being confined or controlled by specific regulations and that "[o]nly by refusing to recognize a new constitutional right to die can this Court hope to prevent the incursion of more 'Dr. Deaths' who will offer the sick, infirm, depressed, and aged only the siren song of a painless death."²⁰⁹ This brief utilized signaling, emotive, and policy arguments.

b. Non-Governmental Amici

i. Religious Organizations

Petitioners also received significant support from non-governmental entities. The United States Catholic Conference²¹⁰ along with many other religious organizations submitted a coalition brief that included less argument of religious ethics than repetition of the legal arguments made by other amici. Besides repetition, this brief also signaled the breadth and diversity of religious organizations supporting petitioner's arguments.

ii. Medical Health Organizations

Certain members of the health community supported petitioners' position. The AMA's amicus brief took an ethical approach arguing that "[t]he power to assist in intentionally taking the life of a patient is antithetical to the central mission of healing that guides both medicine and nursing.”²¹¹ Other professional health groups signed on to the brief as well. Moreover, the brief cautioned that declaring a fundamental right to physician-assisted suicide may slow efforts to improve the provision of pain relief and “compassionate end-of-life care.”²¹² The AMA’s brief did not simply repeat legal arguments. Instead, the brief made use of ethical, signaling, and externality arguments in an effort to broaden the Court’s perspective on the issue.

iii. Conservative Right to Life Groups

A number of briefs supporting petitioner came from conservative right to life groups who anticipated the impact this case would have in the abortion and other legal contexts. At the appellate level, the right to life agenda had suffered a setback when the court relied heavily on the broad construction of liberty defined in Planned Parenthood v. Casey.²¹³ Consequently, these groups attempted to shift the balance, using this case as their platform. The Family Research Council submitted a brief that focused exclusively on the history of abuse surrounding euthanasia.²¹⁴ The brief cited the Holocaust as history’s most tragic and relevant experience with physician-assisted suicide en route to supporting a blanket ban on physician-assisted suicide.²¹⁵ The brief made no mention of the abortion issue, but instead attempted to quietly affect other contexts through emotive appeals. Other right to life organizations took a more direct approach. For instance, the American Center for Law and Justice²¹⁶ and the New Hope Life Center, argued against adopting Casey’s “existentialist notion of liberty” that would lead “to claims of [the] right to use drugs, and to engage in polygamy, fornication, adultery, divorce, sodomy, bestiality, and consensual sadism.”²¹⁷ Similarly, the Rutherford Institute²¹⁸ and the National Right to Life Committee²¹⁹ submitted briefs arguing against the constitutionality of assisted suicide using different legal arguments. Beyond the pretextual issue of assisted suicide, right to life groups sought to plant language and arguments that would bolster right to life advocates' position in the abortion context.

2. Amici Supporting Respondents

No governmental entities submitted briefs in favor of respondents; however, respondent support came from a number of sources.

a. Brief on Behalf of an Individual

A California resident afflicted with the late stages of the AIDS virus submitted a supporting brief.²²⁰ The amicus, John Doe, had obtained a judgment in the District Court for the Central District of California that found a similar statute criminalizing assisted suicide invalid.²²¹ Within John Doe's statement of interest, he described in vivid detail the symptoms and effects of his illness asserting that AIDS patients are "emaciated beyond belief, reminiscent of starving individuals in Ethiopia or the dead photographed concentration camp victims from World War II."²²² John Doe argued that a statute imposing an absolute prohibition on physician-assisted suicide intruded into the realm of private decision making "protected by the guarantee of liberty."²²³ This brief provides yet another example of emotive and legal argumentation.

b. Legal Organizations

The ACLU, joining many other organizations, submitted a brief in support of respondents.²²⁴ Unlike other amici, the ACLU's basic organizational function is to litigate. The ACLU lacks a discretely defined constituency, but has, according to its statement of interest, over "300,000 members" nationwide.²²⁵ In general, the ACLU's brief used legal argumentation. The thrust of the ACLU's argument (as with other amici supporting respondents) was that a state's categorical ban on physician-assisted suicide as applied to competent terminally ill patients was unconstitutional.²²⁶

c. Reproductive Rights and Women's Groups

Reproductive and women's rights groups supported respondents because they identified parallels between physician-assisted suicide and abortion legislation. The appellate court decision supported the reproductive and women's rights agenda because the decision relied heavily on a broad construction of liberty asserted in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, an abortion case. The National Women's Health Network and the Northwest Women's Law Center together submitted a brief in support of respondents²²⁷ that argued "[i]f the States' position were accepted, an individual's ability to make certain highly intimate and personal choices—whether those choices are about procreation, abortion, or death—could be denied through a blanket ban"²²⁸ The Center for Reproductive Law and Policy urged the Court not to consider its abortion precedents in the instant case because the "history of discrimination against women, justify a different standard of review"²²⁹ The amici apparently feared that the close link between the right to an abortion and a right to physician-assisted suicide would potentially weaken the pro-choice position.²³⁰ Therefore, the amici supported respondents. Reproductive and women's rights groups attempted to instruct the Court about externalities beyond the physician-assisted suicide context. These groups were also partaking in counteractive lobbying to offset the efforts of the right to life amici.

d. Gay Rights and AIDS Advocacy Organizations

Constituencies that perceived themselves as disproportionately affected by the Court's decision, such as gay rights and AIDS advocacy organizations, also supported respondents.²³¹ In a brief submitted by the Gay Men's Health Crisis and Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, the amici argued that the right to end one's life was a fundamental liberty interest.²³² The brief contained statements from prominent individuals with disabilities and terminal illnesses and also marshaled the argument that denial of the right to assistance in dying denies people with terminal illnesses equal protection under the law.²³³ Besides making legal arguments, the amici made emotive and signaling arguments to the Court.

e. Mental Health Professionals

A coalition brief of mental health professionals asserted that “[a]s mental health professionals, we have no interest in ‘promoting’ assisted suicide. Our interest lies, instead, in the promotion of patient autonomy . . . and in the sound development of the law to that end.”²³⁴ Despite an espoused ambivalence about physician-assisted suicide, the amici concluded that the Supreme Court should uphold the lower court decision on patient autonomy grounds. Similarly, a national medical student organization and a group of distinguished medical professionals argued that physician-assisted suicide should be an available option to competent terminally ill patients.²³⁵ In contrast to the AMA brief that focused on a physician’s ethical obligation to their patient, amici for respondents focused on patient autonomy arguing that “[t]he principle of patient autonomy is equally central to medical ethics and to defining the physician’s role in end-of-life decisions.”²³⁶ These briefs in favor of respondents along with the briefs supporting petitioner signaled to the Court the split in the medical community and the health profession.

3. Neutral Amici

Not all amici support a particular party; neutral advocacy is also an option. In Glucksberg, *Choice in Dying, Inc.*²³⁷ took no legal position, but instead sought “to establish an empirically based framework by which these important issues may be considered”²³⁸ Although the organization’s name suggests otherwise, Choice in Dying presented themselves to the Court as a neutral amicus participating to clarify misconceptions surrounding physician-assisted suicide. The brief’s presentation was neutral in that it cited statistics and observations that could be used by respondents, petitioners, but most importantly by the Court in reviewing the appellate court’s decision.

4. The Glucksberg Court’s Use of Amicus Briefs

The majority opinion in Glucksberg cited the United States’ amicus brief and the states’ coalition brief in its discussion of implicated state interests.²³⁹ Also, the opinion cited several briefs in a footnote to express the Court's recognition of the skepticism surrounding physician-assisted suicide and the potential slippery slope that will follow once a categorical ban is lifted.²⁴⁰ Although the references to amicus briefs are minimal in the opinion, this is not the best way to gauge their importance. Supreme Court Justices may draw from multiple types of information that come to the Court's attention via amici.

B. Roper v. Simmons

In Roper v. Simmons, the Supreme Court addressed the question of whether it was permissible under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution to execute a juvenile offender who was under the age of eighteen when he committed a capital crime.²⁴¹ The Supreme Court held (5–4) in favor of respondent, Christopher Simmons, concluding that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments forbid imposition of the death penalty on offenders who were under the age of eighteen when their crimes were committed. In total, there were eighteen amicus briefs submitted at the merits stage. These briefs were submitted in support of petitioner (i.e., Donald P. Roper, Superintendent, Potosi Correctional Center), and respondent (i.e., Christopher Simmons). The overwhelming majority of briefs (sixteen, in fact) were in support of respondent. The briefs came from a diverse range of parties including professional associations, international organizations and leaders, religious organizations, child advocacy groups, legal organizations and governmental amici. The Simmons amici opted for coalition briefs, which explains some of the difference in the number of briefs compared to Washington v. Glucksberg.

1. Amici Supporting Petitioners

Only two amici supported petitioners and sought to reverse the decision made by the Missouri Supreme Court ruling the execution of juveniles under the age of eighteen unconstitutional. These amici fell into two categories: governmental amici and legal organizations.

a. Governmental Amici

The states of Alabama, Delaware, Oklahoma, Texas, Utah, and Virginia submitted a brief arguing against a bright line rule forbidding executions for offenders under the age of eighteen.²⁴² The amici asserted

²⁴⁰ Id. at 732 n.23.

²⁴¹ Christopher Simmons, at age seventeen, committed a brutal murder. Simmons v. Roper, 112 S.W.3d 397, 399 (Mo. 2003). Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304, 320 (2002), established that the Constitution prohibits the execution of a juvenile who was under the age of eighteen when the crime was committed. Id. The Missouri Supreme Court agreed and set aside Simmons' death sentence. Id. at 413. that, based upon their experience, there is no basis to categorically exempt juveniles below the age of eighteen from execution. Specifically, amici argued that there is a distinction between juveniles at ages sixteen and seventeen compared to the mentally retarded. Thus, a sixteen- or seventeen-year-old's culpability should be an individualized determination. To demonstrate this, amici provided brutal descriptions of crimes committed by juveniles at the age of sixteen and seventeen to illustrate that certain juvenile offenders demonstrate culpability.²⁴³ Here amici relied on legal, signaling, and emotive arguments to persuade the Court to overturn the Missouri Supreme Court's decision.

b. Legal Organizations

The other amici supporting petitioner, Justice for All Alliance, made similar arguments against a bright line prohibition and asked for individualized determinations of culpability for juveniles below the age of eighteen.²⁴⁴ Whereas legal organizations played a minor role as amici supporting petitioner, they played a much greater role as amici supporting respondents.

2. Amici Supporting Respondent

a. Governmental Amici

As a general matter, governmental amici made significant use of legal and signaling arguments. A coalition brief of states argued that there is a legislative consensus (i.e., thirty-one states plus the Federal Government Bar) against imposing the death penalty against juvenile offenders under the age of eighteen.²⁴⁵ Governmental amici also identified trends toward stricter juvenile justice laws that expose juveniles to adult criminal sanctions, yet still draw a distinction with respect to capital punishment.²⁴⁶

b. Non-Governmental Amici

i. International Organizations

International organizations and actors expressed a keen interest in the juvenile capital punishment issue. A coalition brief from the European Union and other members of the international community signaled the international consensus against the execution of juvenile offenders.²⁴⁷ A group of esteemed Nobel Peace Prize Recipients, including former U.S. President James Earl Carter, asked the Court to consider the opinion of the international community in deciding the question of whether the death penalty for juveniles under the age of eighteen was constitutional.²⁴⁸ The brief asserted that a bar of the juvenile death penalty has jus cogens status in international law and referenced a number of international treaties and instruments barring the death penalty for juveniles.²⁴⁹ The brief also signaled international consensus on the juvenile death penalty and portrayed the United States as an anomaly in the international community.²⁵⁰ The amici cited U.S. Supreme Court precedent for considering international norms when reaching a decision.²⁵¹ In addition, the Nobel Prize winners made use of externality arguments, asserting that the United States' sanctioning of juvenile executions would undermine the leverage the United States government would have to influence other countries to improve their own human rights record.²⁵²

Similarly, a brief from Former U.S. Diplomats argued that continuing the administration of the death penalty against juveniles could negatively impact the United States government's standing in the international community.²⁵³ This brief highlighted the condemnation the United States has received from international bodies like the United Nations concerning the execution of juvenile offenders.²⁵⁴ The brief also articulated the diplomatic isolation the United States could face given the consensus in the world community, even among nations with poor human rights records, on the prohibition of juvenile executions.²⁵⁵ Another brief from a coalition of human rights organizations highlighted the historical influence of international law and the United Kingdom on the formation of the United States Constitution, particularly the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment clause.²⁵⁶ This brief made several legal arguments as to why the Supreme Court should consider international law and norms (i.e., embrace comparativism) when considering evolving standards of decency under the Eighth Amendment.

ii. Professional Organizations

Professional organizations, particularly medical and psychological organizations, relied heavily on empirical data, social science, and research-based arguments. The AMA and other organizations filed a coalition brief that provided scientific evidence showing the cognitive and physiological differences between adolescents and adults and how these differences support not extending the death penalty to juveniles.²⁵⁷ Similarly, another coalition brief, filed in part by the American Psychological Association, cited research findings on adolescent psychological development and thought processes that, in the amici's view, undermined the rationale for extending the death penalty to juveniles.²⁵⁸ The brief also cited research that sentencing proceedings did not adequately account for the mitigating factor of adolescence.²⁵⁹

iii. Religious Organizations

Religious organizations also participated as amici, citing their unique qualifications for addressing moral and ethical issues. The Conference of Catholic Bishops and Other Religious Organizations filed a coalition brief asserting the relevance of religious communities' views (e.g., Jewish, Christian, Muslim, Buddhist, etc.) on the imposition of the death penalty and evolving standards of decency.²⁶⁰ This coalition brief signaled to the

iv. Legal Organizations

Legal organizations supporting the respondent had an active presence as amici. The ABA made legal arguments against extending the death penalty to juveniles as well as acknowledging the growing national and international consensus.²⁶¹ The ABA took no position with respect to the death penalty as a general matter. However, the ABA noted its opposition to extending capital punishment to juvenile offenders.²⁶² In a coalition brief filed by the NAACP LDF and other legal organizations, amici highlighted the racial disparities connected with the imposition of the death penalty to juveniles.²⁶³ For example, the brief cited statistics indicating that over fifty percent of juveniles executed since 1973 were either black or Latino.²⁶⁴ The National Legal Aid and Defender Association made legal arguments throughout its brief, concluding with the use of emotive persuasion.²⁶⁵ The conclusion quoted a letter from a former juvenile offender, who, during the 1980s was sentenced to death, but later re-sentenced to life in prison.²⁶⁶ This type of emotive argumentation is perhaps best suited for amici rather than the immediate parties. If similar arguments are made by the immediate parties, they could potentially stigmatize a party.²⁶⁷ Although a number of briefs in the legal organization category were prone to repetition,²⁶⁸ several briefs raised ancillary legal issues such as procedural deficiencies to sway the Court. For example, the Coalition for Juvenile Justice Brief argued that juveniles are “less able to assist counsel, more prone to making false confessions, and more likely to be wrongfully convicted or wrongfully sentenced to death.”²⁶⁹ Robust amicus participation by legal organizations in support of respondent organization, the United States Catholic Conference filed a brief in Washington v. Glucksberg. See Brief for the United States Catholic Conference et al. as Amici Curiae Supporting Respondent, Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997) (No. 96-110), 1996 WL 650919.

reinforces the claim that amici act as a surrogate for vulnerable groups.

v. Child Advocacy and Victim's Rights Groups

Participation by child advocacy and victims groups reflected several argumentation styles such as legal, signaling, policy and counteractive lobbying. The coalition brief of the Juvenile Law Center, included over fifty entities who advocate on behalf of juveniles and children.²⁷⁰ Here, the amici made legal and policy arguments, as well as signaling widespread opposition to the juvenile death penalty.²⁷¹ A brief from Murder Victims' Families for Reconciliation asserted an argument rejecting the idea of using victim's rights as a basis to justify the death penalty for juveniles.²⁷² Here, the amici engaged in a form of counteractive lobbying by asserting that victims are not monolithic in their views of capital punishment.²⁷³ This brief countered arguments made by another victim's rights group in support of petitioner.²⁷⁴

a. The Majority Opinion's References to Amici

The majority opinion in Roper v. Simmons had several direct references to amici. Moreover, information submitted via amici figured prominently into the Court's analysis. The Court acknowledged amici-supporting respondents in several areas. The Court first referenced respondent's amici in its discussion of the key differences between juveniles under eighteen and adults, which demonstrate that juvenile offenders "cannot with reliability be classified among the worst offenders."²⁷⁵ Yet, respondent's amici were most prominent in the Court's discussion of international legal and social norms.²⁷⁶ The Court noted that

“[r]espondent and his amici have submitted, and petitioner does not contest, that only seven countries other than the United States have executed juvenile offenders since 1990”²⁷⁷ The Court also cited the Brief for Human Rights Committee of the Bar of England and Wales et al., when it acknowledged the “opinion of the world community” and the “overwhelming weight of international opinion against the juvenile death penalty.”²⁷⁸ The Court, however, did not limit its references to respondent’s amici with whom the majority agreed. The Court also acknowledged and addressed the arguments raised by state governmental amici for petitioner against a categorical exclusion for juveniles from the death penalty.²⁷⁹

b. The Dissenting Opinions of Justices O’Connor and Scalia

Perhaps the most interesting discussion involving issues and information submitted via amici involved the two dissenting opinions of Justice O’Connor and Justice Scalia that discussed the relevance of international law and expressed some skepticism concerning arguments presented via amici. Justice O’Connor criticized the majority opinion asserting:

Because I do not believe that a genuine national consensus against the juvenile death penalty has yet developed, and because I do not believe the Court’s moral proportionality argument justifies a categorical, age-based constitutional rule, I can assign no such confirmatory role to the international consensus described by the Court. In short, the evidence of an international consensus does not alter my determination that the Eighth Amendment does not, at this time, forbid capital punishment of 17-year-old murderers in all cases.²⁸⁰

Justice O’Connor acknowledged the relevance of international law and norms to the Court’s determination of contemporary standards of decency. Yet Justice O’Connor expressed the opinion that international law has a confirmatory role to play that does not trump domestic standards, values, and consensus as expressed through the actions of the Nation’s legislatures.

On the other hand, Justice Scalia’s dissent took a more radical that the current practice by a few states in the United States violates customary international law”); Roper, England and Wales, supra note 256, at 13–14 (“Numerous treaties, declarations, and pronouncements by international bodies, as well as the laws of the vast majority of nations, are evidence of [this trend].”). stance—asserting that international law and opinion had no relevance to the Court’s inquiry:

The Court thus proclaims itself sole arbiter of our Nation’s moral standards—and in the course of discharging that awesome responsibility purports to take guidance from the views of foreign courts and legislatures. Because I do not believe that the meaning of our Eighth Amendment, any more than the meaning of other provisions of our Constitution, should be determined by the subjective views of five Members of this Court and like-minded foreigners, I dissent.²⁸¹

Justice Scalia did not limit his criticism to input from international amici. He challenged the methodology and reliability of scientific studies particularly those submitted by the American Psychological Association.²⁸² Scalia further added:

Given the nuances of scientific methodology and conflicting views, courts—which can only consider the limited evidence on the record before them—are ill equipped to determine which view of science is the right one. Legislatures “are better qualified to weigh and ‘evaluate the results of statistical studies in terms of their own local conditions and with a flexibility of approach that is not available to the courts.’”²⁸³

Justice Scalia did not support a categorical ban because he was not convinced that there were not individuals under age eighteen who were able to appreciate the nature of their crimes. To highlight this point, he ironically cited the amicus brief from the States of Alabama, Delaware, Oklahoma, Texas, Utah, and Virginia, which provided examples of “monstrous acts” of murder committed by individuals under eighteen.²⁸⁴

The majority and dissenting opinions in Roper highlight the tension between the Court’s role as an independent body and a political actor. They also reflect the inclusionary function of amicus participation.

C. Political Symbolism as reflected in Glucksberg and Simmons resembles a discursive debate and dialogue among multiple constituencies.²⁸⁵ The Court also participates in these ongoing discussions—sometimes directly via its published opinions and, at other times, as a mere listener. The Court’s listening function is particularly important and should not be discounted.²⁸⁶ Unsuccessful, but acknowledged, arguments and perspectives from amici, at a minimum, create the impression that Court decisions are the result of vigorous debate and reasoning.²⁸⁷ In Glucksberg and Simmons, amicus briefs came from a wide variety of amici reflecting divergent viewpoints. Without the inclusion offered by amicus participation, many of the amici and the interests they represented would have been excluded from the Court’s consideration despite being impacted by the scope of the Court’s ruling. Exclusion, in this instance, would engender negative consequences for the Court’s legitimacy. The presence of an open deliberative forum not only increases the prospect of more balanced and perhaps better substantive outcomes, but also enhances the Court’s institutional legitimacy irrespective of a particular decision or outcome.²⁸⁸ Current Supreme Court rules favoring broad or “open door” participation implicitly acknowledge that the Court’s job is not limited to considering the discrete interests of the immediate parties. The “Supreme Court cannot perceive itself as an isolated institution handing down rules from its pedestal in Washington, but instead it should see itself as one actor among many in the midst of a long-term colloquy.”²⁸⁹ Court decisions like Glucksberg and Simmons, although creating a degree of finality for the immediate parties, are only part of an ongoing dialogue between the Court, the public, and their representatives—and not the final decree.²⁹⁰ Amicus participation symbolizes the integrated function of the Supreme Court in American society.²⁹¹

VII. CONCLUSION

This Article does not offer a specific policy or rule revision, but instead recognizes the benefits of preserving the status quo, i.e., broad amicus participation before the Supreme Court. Open door access to amici helps preserve the Court's institutional legitimacy among varied stakeholders without significantly undermining the Court's independence. Amicus participation dispels external criticism that the Court is detached and indifferent to the public. In the absence of a restrictive rule governing amicus participation, the Court has developed its own filtering mechanisms for analyzing amicus briefs and provided informal guidance to potential filers concerning the Court's preferences. Ultimately, criticisms of broad participation are outweighed by the resulting legitimacy gains. The Court's function as a quasi-representative institution is neither without tension nor imperfection. But, in the end, this function is unavoidable.
